11th Sunday in Ordinary Time

It does not take long for a child to discover that life is full of bumps and bruises, physical and emotional. We just can't help but experience disappointment and hurt, nor can we avoid being the cause of them either. So how do we make it up to someone when we've hurt him or her? How do we make things better? A bruised finger or bumped head is cured with a kiss and a cookie, but how do you heal the heart?

When we hurt people we love, we can apologize, do some nice things for them, and really try to do better. We can avoid making the same mistake again and allow time to heal all wounds. But the real power of healing lies within the person who is hurt. The real healing begins when we forgive the offender and let go of the feelings that come with the hurt—anger, resentment or hate. The energy it takes to hold on to these emotions is what keeps the injury from healing. When we forgive, we are not condoning what happened or giving permission for it to happen again. We are simply acknowledging that in spite of the hurt, we can look beyond it to see the good in the other person. Heal your heart, your spouse, and your family. Forgive as you want to be forgiven.
